Traditional City Form

Modern City Form

the traditional city, where a well-organized system minimized the existence of lost spaces. the design of streets, squares, parks, and public spaces seamlessly integrated with individual building designs.

defining

modern city form, expanding beyond its walls into open space. a new spatial structure: leaving undefined exterior spaces, structureless voids.

the modern city, now highly fragmented, their fringes extending beyond the old city walls, typically made up of disconnected areas of built land broken up by pieces of open space.

lost spaces are undesirable urban areas in need of redesign, anti-spaces that make no positive contribution to their surroundings or users. These spaces lack clear definition and fail to connect to its its adjacent elements. They exist along highways, railroad lines, and waterfronts, where major gaps disrupt the overall continuity of the city's structure.

the modern city, now highly fragmented, their fringes extending beyond the old city walls, typically made up of disconnected areas of built land broken up by pieces of open space.

massive lines of infrastructure that divide neighborhoods otherwise connected. connection at the large-scale creates disconnection at the community level. at brussel-noord trainstation the traintracks seperate two strongly disconnected neighborhoods from each other.

give a sense of purpose to the space to the people in brussels and those living around the friche

to maintain the isolated character of the space but, creating a bit of a threshold attract and invite more people in like the theatre does now while entering...

moving through a transitional zone:
from dense city to wild open friche through social control by the safekeepers of the friche making you aware of the space you are entering: creating a sense of value and respect towards this biodiverse oasis do you actually enter?

or is a visual connection enough for you?
... and do you continue your route
