Privacy issues can be solved by introducing closed building blocks, a decision which is reducing the amount of useless decorative greenery and adding building volume for example means more space for new residents. As a result, densification becomes a fertile location for commercial functions which, in turn, attracts more visitors.

Excessive available public spaces is hardly used. Private and public space merge into each other. This ensures unclear boundaries and associated problems.