The studio generates future scenarios in Amsterdam (2050). The disconnection between the fast-growing business area Zuidas and the quiet residential area Oud Zuid, and the lack of amenities raised my concern about the living quality and sustainability of development in the future. My project will be a swimming complex in Oud Zuid, as a part of the public sports and leisure network in the city.

Dutch people are the 4th most active among the EU. 80% people in Amsterdam Zuid exercise at least weekly. There are already a lot of sports facilities in the Oud Zuid Area but more than half of the sports facilities are private, and the traditional sports club system is obstacles for the poor, newcomers to the city or people not belonging to a certain social group to enjoy these sports facilities.

Swimming is among the most physically beneficial sports. It is a perfect form of exercise for the future digital world to enhance mental health. Our appearances and the form of swimming itself also break down some barriers between different social groups. Compared to other sports, such as football or hockey, swimming has a lower compactness and hence suitable for the biggest group in terms of age or physical ability.

In the smart but probably also very expensive and crowded Amsterdam in 2050, I believe the primitive kind of leisure will have even bigger meaning to the city than now.
